

Environmental Law

The Environmental Law Practice Group is comprised of attorneys who specialize in assisting businesses, individuals, and government entities in matters involving environmental compliance and permitting, property transactions, and state and federal litigation.

Our clients must comply with federal, state, and local laws and regulations, which are enforced by various agencies at all levels of the government. Successful resolution of environmental matters can hinge on a proper and specific response to the issues raised.

Attorneys in Plunkett Cooney's Environmental Practice Group have the experience and expertise to assist our clients in connection with a host of environmental issues which may include the negotiating and litigating of cost recovery claims, advising clients in regards to complex hazardous waste regulation, or assisting clients in air quality permit and compliance matters.

Among our environmental law specialists are attorneys who earned undergraduate degrees in engineering and/or related environmental sciences, as well as those who have regulatory and administrative work experience, or both. They hold leadership roles in professional and community organizations and often speak in many forums on environmental issues.

Due to the diversity required to handle environmental law matters, our attorneys have gained experience in other areas, such as corporate law, civil litigation, criminal litigation and real estate law. Such experience is key to understanding and addressing the far-reaching impact of environmental issues. Additionally, our specialists act as co-counsel to attorneys from other firms who seek expertise in handling their own clients' environmental concerns.
